

BAREFOOT KINESIOLOGIST

The Unbecoming Journal

Guided prompts for self-worth, self-love
& personal power

ANITA GIBBONS

Emotions & Metaphysical Kinesiology

Before you begin

This is not a workbook. It is not a five-step plan. It is an invitation to sit down with yourself — perhaps for the first time in a long while — and ask the questions that actually matter.

The prompts inside are drawn from the three themes I see arise most often in my sessions with women: self-worth, self-love, and personal power. Simple questions. The kind that land somewhere true, and stay there.

Writing is the body's way of catching up with itself. In a session, the body speaks through muscle testing. In journalling, it speaks through the pen. Both are ways of bypassing the edited, managed, performing version of yourself, and getting to something more honest beneath.

You do not need to be a writer. You do not need to produce anything beautiful or coherent. You just need to write without stopping, without judging, and without knowing where it is going. The prompt is simply the door. What you find on the other side is yours.

“I use journalling inside my sessions because it gives women a way to keep the conversation going between appointments. The page holds things the mind tries to put away.”

— Anita

A gentle way to use this journal: work through one theme at a time, in whatever order calls to you. Read each prompt, then write for as long as it takes — a sentence, a page, whatever comes. There is no correct amount, and no correct answer.

01

THE PULL

Self-Worth

Most of us have never been asked where our sense of worth actually comes from. We reach for approval, for reassurance, for a nod that we are enough — often without realising we are doing it. These prompts ask you to trace that reaching back to its source, and to sit, honestly, with what you find.

Sit with these, one at a time

01.1

Where does your validation come from?

Internally, or externally? Notice who or what you look to before you let yourself feel proud, or good enough.

01.2

What would you need to believe about yourself to stop seeking permission from others?

Write the sentence you'd need to believe, even if you don't fully believe it yet.

01.3

When did you first learn that your worth was conditional?

A moment, a comment, a comparison — whatever comes up first is usually the right place to start.

01.4

What do you achieve for yourself, and what do you achieve to be seen?

Be honest. There is no wrong answer, only an unexamined one.

01.5

If no one ever found out, would you still do it?

Pick one thing you're proud of and ask this. What does the answer tell you?

01.6

What is one belief about your worth you are ready to put down?

Not fixed — just ready to loosen your grip on, even slightly.

02

THE TURNING

Self-Love

Not what you have been told it should look like. Not bubble baths and morning routines. What does self-love actually mean, in your body, in your daily life? These prompts cut through the noise and ask you to define it in your own words, perhaps for the first time.

Sit with these, one at a time

02.1

What is self-love to you?

In your own words — not anyone else's definition, not a Pinterest quote. Yours.

02.2

How do you speak to yourself when you make a mistake?

Write down the actual words. Would you say them to someone you love?

02.3

What is one part of yourself you have been waiting for permission to accept?

It doesn't need to be resolved today. Just named.

02.4

When do you feel most at home in your body?

A moment, a place, an activity. What is present in you then that isn't always present?

02.5

What would change if you treated rest as something you deserved, not something you earned?

Notice any resistance that comes up as you write this one.

02.6

What is one small, unglamorous way you could care for yourself this week?

Small is the point. Self-love is rarely a grand gesture.

03

THE SHEDDING

Personal Power

Power is not loud. For most women it lives in specific, unremarkable moments — a conversation where they spoke their truth, a decision made from their own centre rather than someone else's expectations. These prompts ask you to find those moments, name them, and understand what they have in common.

Sit with these, one at a time

03.1

When do you feel most empowered?

A specific memory, not a general idea. What was true about that moment?

03.2

What is one decision you made recently from your own centre, not someone else's expectations?

If nothing comes to mind, that's useful information too.

03.3

Where in your life are you still outsourcing your power to someone else's opinion?

Be specific — a person, a role, a relationship.

03.4

What would you do differently if you trusted yourself completely?

Don't edit the answer to sound reasonable. Let it be big if it wants to be.

03.5

What is a boundary you have been afraid to set?

Write what you would say if fear wasn't part of the equation.

03.6

Whose voice do you hear when you doubt yourself — and whose voice do you want to hear instead?

Often it's not our own. Naming it is the first step to changing it.

You have already felt the pull.

That persistent feeling that there is more — that is not restlessness. That is recognition. You don't need clarity or a plan. Just the willingness to keep asking yourself the truth.

If you would like company for the next part of this

WWW.THEBAREFOOTKINESIOLOGIST.COM
HELLO@THEBAREFOOTKINESIOLOGIST.COM

This journal is a complementary self-reflection tool and is not a substitute for medical or mental-health care. If you are in distress, please reach out to a qualified professional — in Australia, Lifeline is available on 13 11 14.